

Make wireless phone number portability a requirement immediately. We have waited for years of delay tactics by the wireless providers, and they have provided every excuse under the sun, to avoid the reality that the only reason consumers remain with them is because of the contracts binding consumers to the service. FCC get portability required now, so the number, not the provider, can move consumers into a position of using this technology as a tool, and not having the providers duck behind a law to protect their mediocrity of service: only with portability will they actually spend the money to build the network to make service universal, and to compete on service, rather than on this servitude of contract-binding.
